COMING OF AGE KOREAN STYLE

Do you know why the third Monday of May is so special in Korea?

It is because you can only celebrate this day once in your life. It is Korea's coming-of-age day: something traditionally celebrated by both young men and women in the same year that they turn twenty years old. After this serious and special day, these ex-teenagers will be adult members of society. In the ceremony, they become aware of the importance of being an adult and leading the future of Korea.

So, what do you have to do if you want to take part in this festival?

You have to wear traditional Korean clothes, known as handbok. These are colourful and beautiful. The young people sit in special seats in large groups - it's so impressive that it's turned into a real tourist attraction in Korea, while some foreign students actually take part in the celebration themselves. During the ceremony, the children bow to their parents out of respect. In turn, the parents also bow to their children to recognise their children's pledge to be responsible adults. Sadly, many of these customs are now seen as quite old-fashioned and are often not passed on to the next generation.

Is there a fun part?

For sure! You can take lots of great snaps and, of course, there are the gifts you receive on your special day. For girls, the most popular presents these days include jewellery, bags, perfume or cosmetics, while for boys, watches, electric shavers or aftershave are all well-liked. However, some girls still prefer the three traditional presents - perfume, flowers and a kiss. The perfume signifies 'Please remember me', the flowers represent happiness and beauty, and the kiss, love.

And what about the future?

Well, there are fears that the traditional coming-of-age day festival is being lost in Korea. Many young people now decide to organise more modern versions of the ceremony instead. To some young Koreans, twenty might seem a little old to become an adult! That's a shame because it's a totally unique festival.

1. The coming of age ceremony is an once-in-a-lifetime event.
2. This festival engages young people of both genders.
3. Participation in the ceremony is limited to Koreans under the age of twenty.
4. The participants of the ceremony are still not considered to be real adults after the event.
5. It is not required to wear the traditional clothes to take part in the festival.
6. The tourists lack interest in the festival.
7. Young Koreans and their parents mutually show respect to each other.
8. The traditions of the festival are starting to be forgotten.

9. The age of twenty is now seen as too young to be considered an adult.
10. Each of the three traditional presents holds its own significance.

Anyone for a grasshopper sandwich?

Two billion people already eat bugs as part of their regular diet, according to the United Nation's Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO). Most people in Europe, however, reject the idea of entomophagy, the technical term for the human consumption of insects. (11)_____. If citizens of Europe are going to have to start eating insects to combat world hunger, as the FAO has suggested, somebody will have to persuade them that it is a good idea.

The main barrier to the proposal is consumer disgust. A plate of locusts in a salad, where they look as if they are about to jump up at you, is more likely to put European diners off their food than encourage them to try it. One approach to dealing with this obstacle is to disguise the insects contained in the food by grinding them into a powder to make 'protein flour'. This process is already underway at an insect farm in Malaga, Spain, which makes fishmeal for fish farms on the Andalusian coast. But 'protein flour' can potentially be used in food meant for human consumption as well.

However, there are those who would rather see insects served in their original shape and form. Rene Redzepi, chef and co-founder of the world's most fashionable restaurant, Noma in Copenhagen, regularly includes insects on the menu. Redzepi's research unit, Nordic Food Lab, does experiments into insect 'deliciousness'. (12)_____. Its most famous creation is the 'chimp stick' - a liquorice root brushed with honey and studded with lots of other tasty ingredients, such as fruits, seeds, crushed grains, leaves, flowers and ... ants. It is designed to make the point that humans are primates and they enjoy pretty much the same kind of things as their chimpanzee cousins, including the taste of ants.

The fact that a prestigious establishment like Noma serves bugs to its diners, who pay around €200 a head for the tasting menu, goes some way in dispelling the myth that insects are just meat for those who don't have money. (13)_____.In countries currently in the depth of recession, comments below news articles on the internet reflect the view that 'salaries are going down, economically we're doing badly and we're going to have to eat insects.' (14)_____.

Despite the antipathy to insects, economics and demographics make it all but inevitable that the Western world will ultimately start eating them. Insect marketers are looking to sushi for inspiration. In the UK, people initially had problems with it because they weren't used to eating raw fish. But in thirty years, it has gone from relative obscurity to being available in every supermarket. (15)_____. However, this will only be achieved if the top chefs can come up with recipes for using this cheap source of food in dishes that appeal to the general public.

a) Researchers at the lab believe that eating bugs is part of a wider move towards diversifying the food supply.
b) If the same can be done with insects, then the battle against world hunger may be won.
c) The activity is usually associated with the grim tasks set for celebrities in the jungle on reality shows.
d) This is the interpretation that entomophagists want to avoid, although it seems that they may be too late.
e) This kind of attitude does nothing to further the attractions of entomophagy.
